Note from the Chief Articles Editor

The Volume 44 Board of Editors of the McGeorge Law Review is proud to present the second issue of our forty-fourth volume. Kicking off the issue is a unique look at the past: a symposium featuring thoughts of several men serving in the Department of Justice during the Civil Rights era. Included in this collection is a conversation with John Doar, guided by esteemed Yale Law Professor Owen Fiss. As our nation begins to rekindle the debate over voting rights, we cannot think of a more appropriate addition to this debate than these individuals’ comments.

The issue thereafter presents two scholarly articles. Megan Knize, former Editor-in-Chief of the UC Davis Law Review, explores gender inequity in law reviews, proposing several controversial but intriguing solutions. Then, Professor Richard Bales and Matthew Miller-Novak examine arbitration provisions in minors’ contracts, delineating when such provisions should be enforced.

In addition to these articles, several comments authored by members of the McGeorge Law Review follow. Russell Cooper explores the search incident to arrest doctrine in the context of information on smartphones. Allison L. Cross proposes statutory reforms to address human trafficking victims prosecuted for crimes committed as a result of their human trafficking situation. Steven Thomas Fazzi provides an objective analysis of California’s realignment legislation; in an independent article, Andrew M. Ducart proposes a solution to realignment shortfalls. Finally, Maryn Oyoung delves into employment law in regard to pregnancy-related accommodation, and offers a statutory approach to ensuring that pregnant women receive reasonable accommodations.

On behalf of the Volume 44 Board of Editors, I would like to thank our editors and staff for their continued hard work. We are also especially grateful to Pauline Rodriguez, who leads every issue to publication. Finally, we would like to thank the McGeorge faculty and administration for their continued support of the journal, especially Professor Rachael Salcido and Associate Dean Julie Davies.
